

Know All, Not Knowing

I couldn't get a handle on a title for this column, but my thoughts are something along these lines...how little we know, how eager to learn.

This new squad I formed, pBus, has members throwing up questions of which I have some answers, but more a lot of ignorance.

Questions for example to do with player personalities in teams or preferred tactical options or specific training for specific requirements or a successful one size fits all game plan.

All these enquiries trigger my interest. My quest to find answers, more answers, more view points, more realistic ways to make it happen out there on the green.

It takes patience, it takes perseverance, it takes on a need to include others and their knowledge, in my case this squad, in the exercise and search for suggested successful approaches.

Keeping asking questions may lead to answers and may lead to even more questions and may lead to seeking out even more people who share the common interest to find ways to do bowls stuff better. Our squad motto is 'no limits' accordingly.

Even as I get another day older I have a role in life called Learner, but in that role I am an active participant and continue to be a better Learner.

After my lengthy experience as a coach learning the craft, my knowledge base has grown yet my quest to strive to continue to learn, to continue my curiosity, never wavers.
